

ABSTRACT

Long Distance Relationships are one of the factors that arise in marriage because of demands and are a responsibility that must be done. This can cause a bad impact on marital relationship and make communication ineffective. Effective interpersonal communication is an important aspect to be considered in long-distance relationships. Interpersonal communication between Wife and Husband in Facing Remote Relationships, the author focuses on wives and husbands who experience long-distance relationships in Citra Gran Cibubur housing. The method used in this study is a qualitative method using an interpretative descriptive paradigm that can convey, give social significance by describing problems aimed at explaining research phenomena. In this study, researchers found that the barriers that occur in married couples long-distance relationships are sensitivity and miscommunication. Then for media, communication is done for long-distance married couples directly through social media and non-verbal communication by sending photos/video and controlling couples with shared keys. However, each informant has a different form of interpersonal communication in coping with their marriage to build the effectiveness of interpersonal communication relationships and reduce each other's uncertainty, although the physical distance and time required are efforts because each partner must depend on each other.
