

ABSTRACT

Human life has several very important phases. One of them is childhood, a time when one learns many things for the first time. At this stage, a person can have unpleasant experiences that can leave an impression and continue until the child becomes an adult. When this happens, it is very likely that the child will grow up with inner wounds. If these wounds are not treated properly, they can lead to various physical and mental illnesses in the future. In this work, the author will visualize the impact of unresolved mental wounds in the future, and show the importance of healing mental wounds for optimal adolescent and adult survival. By using the double exposure method, this issue will be packaged through an experimental film without narration or dialog. Then some visual symbols will convey semiotic elements or implied messages.

Keywords: Experimental Film, Inner Child, Inner Wound, Impact of Inner Wound.