

ABSTRACT

Psychological Well-Being can be created by every human being with the ability to be able to understand themselves and accept all the shortcomings produced by each human being. The existence of psychological well-being can occur with encouragement from parents. The purpose of parental participation in every child's life is able to cause a sense of security and comfort to make every child avoid symptoms of depression that are rife. This study was made to determine the psychological well-being and the role of closeness of parents and children in the prevention of depression. The author uses qualitative content analysis method with descriptive paradigm study case. The data validity techniques used are source triangulation and investigation triangulation. The results of this study show that "Analysis of Psychological Well-Being and the Role of Parental Closeness on Depression Prevention (Case Study of Telkom Bandung University Students)" states that the psychological well-being of every human being can be created in themselves and the role of closeness and encouragement of parents is able to bring every child to have a sense of protection both in psychological and mental terms. These results prove that psychological well-being and the role of parents towards children make every child avoid depression.
